In recent history, an unsubstantiated separation between the fine arts and graphic design has been made. Many believe that today's graphic design centers around commercial gain rather than personal expression. Through careful manipulation, juxtaposition, and a few unexpected visual metaphors, a recent series of personal design works help to communicate an individualized point of view, blurring the perceived distinctions between fine art and graphic design.