The 2012 winner of the Society of Midland Authors Award for Nonfiction, Thirteen Loops: Race Violence and the Last Lynching in America recounts the story of three interrelated, race-related murders that occurred over a fifty year time period throughout the state of Alabama, culminating in the 1981 murder of Michael Donald—often deemed the last lynching in America. Donald's death not only reignited the race debate in America, but also forced a courtroom drama in which the United Klans of America were at long last put on trial.
