This article examines the relationship between how strongly citizens trust the judiciary to act impartially and the process by which judges are selected. We find that citizens are more likely to believe their state and local judiciaries act impartially when these judges are elected by the public rather than selected by a governor or other administrative process. We also find that trust in the fairness of elected judges does not appear to be connected to whether the election is partisan or non-partisan.