Transition countries display generally low levels of public support for market economic principles during the 1990s – but more successful countries display more support than less successful ones. The attitude difference is not just the result of transition speed or success. Rather, the data suggests that the varying levels of public support towards market economic principles existed initially and are a cause of the distinct transition trajectories. Different historical legacies affected popular attitudes long before the watershed moment of 1990.