In this set of experiments, Katelyn, Luke, and I documented systematic evidence of people's tendency to inappropriately infer cause-and-effect from correlational research and statements. We showed that this error in reasoning is prevalent among adults of varying ages and cuts across education levels. We discussed the dangers of media headlines and blurbs that reinforce and reflect this error in reasoning, and suggest that people may need explicit training and practice to overcome it.