We conducted a survey to assess health care coverage, health care concerns and attitudes toward health care reform. The majority of insured and uninsured respondents felt the current health care system had major problems. Although there was a great deal of concern regarding both cost and access, those without insurance were significantly more worried than the insured. Despite this difference, both groups strongly felt that all residents should have access to the same basic care. We also conducted interviews with a subset of our sample. These interviews further supported our earlier conclusions that all respondents have worries, but those without insurance struggle in the current system far more than the insured.

Co-authors also include Professor Emerita Lois Taft, Nursing, and Alumna Kathy German-Olson.