The current cost of a college education is concerning to all. Borrowing heavily makes many worry whether higher ed is even "worth it." Economists worry that student loan debt may be delaying marriage, home-buying, and other economically important activities.

Yet, a bachelor's degree remains the ticket to professional careers and a middle-class life. So a college degree is increasingly necessary at a time when it’s also increasingly unaffordable.

So, how might we re-imagine college in 25 years? If current trends are unsustainable, how might higher education be changed by the time today's UW-Eau Claire students send their own children to college?
