Coronary artery bypass grafting is the most common heart surgery performed for blocked coronary arteries in patients who have chest pain or have suffered from heart attacks or now have poor heart function. The debate for more than 60 years has been about what conduit should we use to bypass the blocked coronary arteries and what risks it would involve for different patient groups.