Syverson published Adventures in Glacier Bay about his time with the National Geographic Society's Burroughs Glacier Expedition (1989-91). Syverson, along with one or two other researchers, spent two summers in Glacier Bay 50 miles from the nearest human outpost. He chronicles food and toilet paper shortages (his famous Red Fryer Foods story), his encounter with the Plain of Doom, and everyday life in the backcountry. He also explores the excitement and emotional turmoil of going home. Personal reflections and >100 color photographs in an 8” x 10” publication format are used to immerse the reader in his Alaskan wilderness adventure.
