Wisconsin Act 31 was established to address American Indians as a response to treaty rights issues and racism. The Act requires that all public schools and pre-service education programs provide students with basic information regarding tribal sovereignty, treaties, and cultures of Wisconsin recognized Native Nations. Over the last two decades, Native Nations, educators, and allies have created curriculum and recommendations to provide a proper understanding of American Indian peoples’ history, culture, and complexities within contemporary society. Through a combined effort, there is more awareness of the importance of Wisconsin Act 31 but the state continues to struggle with sufficient implementation.
